Senate Continues Work on Repeal and Replacement of the Affordable Care Act (ACA)

After last week's release of the updated Better Care Reconciliation Act (BCRA), including a controversial amendment to offer skinny plans by Senator Ted Cruz (R-TX) and limited changes to increase Medicaid funding for moderate Republicans, four Senators indicated their disapproval of the legislation, killing the chances for passage in its current form.

Shortly following that announcement, Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-KY) announced he would have the Senate vote on a previously passed version of ACA repeal from 2015 that repealed parts of the ACA with a two year transition to replace the program. This legislation passed the Senate with only one Republican defector, but was, as expected, vetoed by President Obama in January 2016. This additional option for the Senate was soon also shut down by three Republicans indicating they would not support the legislation.

Conversations continue to identify ways to bring moderate Republicans to support one of the two repeal options now available but much remains uncertain. With Senator John McCain (R-AZ) out from a recent diagnosis of a brain tumor, the ability for Republicans to reach the necessary 51 votes is difficult. Leader McConnell still intends to bring forward one of the bill options early next week for a vote, but at this time it is not clear whether they will have enough support to procedurally move forward, let alone pass repeal legislation. In addition, the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) has come out with updated scores of both bills.
